Varia in Chinese Place Names
News reports frequently disagree on the use of old or new forms for Chinese place names. Some sources use "Peking" and others the older "Peking". Because of this disagreement we have shown both names on the map where space permits—in Tientsin (Tientsin) in Sinking Province. In the more crowded areas of eastern China we have shown the form which seems most widely used. Alternate names for most of the more important places will be found in the following list. We have not, however, included the numerous place names whose endings have been changed from "chow" to "shu". For example, Chienan, in Sinking Province, is sometimes seen as "Chienan-shu".
